PANIKKAR PREFACE INDIA presents a baffling problem which may well tax all the latent resources of British statesmanship. There is a clash of wills between the two peoples British and Indian: the spokesmen of the one convinced that not only its own interests, but also those of the other, require that that other shall yet abide in statu pupillari those of the other equally convinced that it will best discharge all its responsibilities in a state of emancipation. Both rely upon facts honestly maintained to be unquestionable, but of which the assessment as to future possibilities, at any rate, belongs to the realm of speculation. The one is, however, not disposed to allow any element of speculation in matters of hard practical politics the other, arguing alike from innate faith and examples not very dissimilar, refuses to admit that there is any room for speculative uncertainty in a forecast of the ultimate issue. Nevertheless, the problem of the attainment of political freedom by India is not free from complexities. And yet the essence of the problem is capable of the simplest solution, if only a subjective estimate of the essentials of human nature, in the twentieth century, provide its basis. The open sesame would be found in the faculty on which Gordon Pasha laid so much emphasis or for which, possibly, he prayed. But, assuming that the crisis which has undoubtedly arisen in India enables the statesmen of England to get into the skins of their fellowsubjects of British India and their friendly neighbours of Indian India, the satisfactory adjustment of the country's internal relations would still...
